In the short term, I could not agree more. Hannibal might have started the war, but Zama ended it. Strategically, the battle that ended the 2nd Punic War was more important than one famous tactical defeat that happened fairly early in the conflict. OTOH, Cannae is probably the most successful battle ever.

Would his career have been the same without this experience in leadership and warfare? And what if Philip had lost? It was a pretty close run thing, with Diodorus describing it as "once joined, the battle was hotly contested for a long time and many fell on both sides, so that for a while the struggle permitted hopes of victory to both". Had it ...
